CAUSE	CONSEQUENCE
August 1914 Britain declared war on Germany.	Men were expected to join the forces to defend their country.
Men in Britain enlisted as soldiers.	As the men signed up to fight they had to leave their jobs.
There were not enough workers to do all the jobs that men did.	Women and children began to work in factories, on farms, on transport… doing all the jobs left by the men.
Women and children started to work in the jobs that men had done.	With the encouragement of parents some children worked in factories and mills.
Some children worked in factories	Children who worked in factories and mills could not go to school for a whole day so they started to work for half a day.
Working children could only go to school for half a day.	Children were tired and missed some vital hours of lessons.
More and more women and children went to work.	More men were able to join the forces as the jobs at home were taken care of.
Women and children worked really hard and in difficult conditions.	Because women and children worked so hard Britain managed to produce food and goods to support the country.
